The three-part routine

1 · Change deliberately

Handle one external plate at a time over a clean, stable surface. Align the compatible plate directly above the registered interface and lower it without dragging the finished face across another object.

2 · Clean gently

Use the material-specific instructions issued with the registered system. Abrasive polish, jewelry cleaner, solvents and improvised tools can permanently alter a finish or damage a setting.

3 · Store separately

Keep external plates dry and divided so finished surfaces do not rub. A fitted case should identify each plate by collection and material without relying on memory.

When to stop using an external plate

Set the plate aside if it no longer seats completely, shows a changed edge, has sustained an impact, or contains a stone that moves. A different registered plate may be used only within the instructions associated with the system.

Annual review

The collection, settings, finish condition and interface are reviewed together. Occasional-wear pieces belong at the review even when they have not been worn since the previous visit.

Travel vocabulary

Carry the Plate Identification Card and describe the system as a registered external plate with an implanted interface. The card organizes the conversation; it is not a security exemption or medical clearance.

Public-site privacy

Do not email photographs, records, symptoms, identification or insurance information to an address published on the public website. Public email addresses are for general correspondence only.
